ATTITUDES TO WOMEN IN THE BBC IN THE 1970S – NOT SO MUCH A GLASS CEILING AS ONE OF REINFORCED CONCRETE

Suzanne Franks

The BBC was in its earliest days considered an 'enlightened' employer of women. By the early 1970s, when feminist aspirations had led to wider awareness of workplace equality issues, the BBC was no longer in the vanguard of change.

A confidential internal report on the position of female staff in the corporation highlighted very limited scope for advancement and the widespread discrimination and hostile attitudes towards women. Yet despite repeated analysis of the problem over subsequent years there was little progress towards meaningful opportunities for women. A sea change was taking place in the expectations of younger women, yet within the corporation complacent attitudes about the process needed for any real change abounded among senior management. Despite some piecemeal adjustments it took another decade after the

BBC RADIO 1 John Peel

From Monday to Thursday JOHN PEEL brings you rock music with the accent on the new and the unusual. The show is a mixture of records and sessions specially recorded for the BBC. Folk, reggae and rock classics rub shoulders with the latest manifestations from the new wave of punk. For more than ten years the programme has acted as a showcase for the newest British rock talent and many stars appeared on the show as unknowns before they had made their first commercial recordings.
